“Development of correct aseptic practice is essential for nurses to reduce the risk of hospital acquired infections (HAI). In reviewing current educational strategies there appear to be a number of issues facing student nurses when learning to correctly manage a wound or other intervention that requires aseptic technique. This article does not intend to advise on specific wound management interventions, rather it simply intends to extend the debate on the use of aseptic non touch technique (ANTT) combined with a wound field approach to reduce wound and invasive procedure complexity.”
